Duke University Press posts site license for e-Duke Scholarly Collection on new online library resource center; announces international pricing model

Duke University Press has announced that the site license for the new e-Duke Scholarly Collection is now available for download. “We have been fortunate to receive significant feedback from librarians regarding our current site licenses. We have been able to incorporate much of this valuable feedback into our e-Duke Scholarly Collection site license,” noted Library Relations Manager, Kimberly Steinle. “In doing so, it is our hope that we have created a straightforward and accessible site license that meets the needs of our institutional customers.”

The site license is available for download on the Duke University Press website (www.dukeupress.edu/library/eDuke/sitelicense.html). Librarians can view Duke University Press’s new “Library Resource Center,” which—in addition to hosting the site license—acts as a repository of information (access information, pricing, online availability of Duke journals, etc.) of particular interest to librarians at www.dukeupress.edu/library.

In addition to announcing the availability of the site license, Duke University Press also announced the creation of a new international pricing model for its e-Duke Scholarly Collection. The model is based on an institution’s existing holdings (both volume and serial) and economic class as determined by World Bank Development Indicators. More information regarding the international pricing model can be found at www.dukeupress.edu/library/eDuke/intlpricing.html.

For more information on how to order the e-Duke Scholarly Collection, please contact Duke University Press at edukecollection@dukeupress.edu or visit www.dukeupress.edu/library.
